PROJECT DESCRIPTION

We live in a time of climate crisis, environmental degradation, and constant exposure to alarming information. As a result, many young people experience eco-anxiety, feelings of worry, frustration, or helplessness about the future of our planet. At the same time, the green transition requires active, resilient, and empowered young citizens who are ready to contribute to sustainable change. Re:Earth aims to transform climate-related anxiety into meaningful environmental action. Through non-formal learning methods, experiential workshops, and collaborative activities, participants will explore the emotional impact of the climate crisis, develop green skills, and gain practical tools to actively engage in their local communities. The project combines environmental awareness, emotional resilience, and youth participation, encouraging young people to move from concern to commitment and from reflection to action.

PROJECT AIMS

- Increase awareness and understanding of eco-anxiety and its impact on young people's wellbeing and engagement. Equip participants with practical green skills and tools that enable them to actively contribute to environmental sustainability in their communities. Promote youth participation in environmental decision-making processes at local and European levels. Encourage the development of small-scale, youth-led green initiatives and action plans.
- Strengthen resilience, emotional intelligence, and collective responsibility among participants.
